Course Overview

In 1955, publishing executive William Spaulding invited Dr. Seuss to dinner. Spaulding had heard reports that American children were falling behind Soviet children in reading comprehension because they found their primers boring and would rather spend their time watching television and reading comic books. Spaulding gave Dr. Seuss (Theodor Geisel) a list of three hundred words and asked him to write a book that a first grader could read on her own. Dr. Seuss returned a manuscript titled The Cat in the Hat. Spaulding worried that six-year-olds weren't pulling their weight in the Cold War, and he built a commercial market for children's literature as a weapon against the Soviet Union.

This course investigates some of the surprising connections between the Cold War and American culture. The Cold War, in which the capitalist West vied with the communist Soviet bloc for dominance in nuclear weapons and space exploration and influence in decolonizing Asia and Africa, left few things untouched in postwar America, including an illustrated cat in a hat. Some of the connections we explore will be obvious: McCarthyism in Ray Bradbury's Fahrenheit 451 (1953), American imperial desire in Graham Green's The Quiet American (1955). Others will be more implicit: the containment of the black left in Alice Childress's Like One of the Family (1956), the long shadow of the Korean War in Chang-rae Lee's Native Speaker (1995).

This course asks how Cold War politics governed the culture Americans made and consumed in the years after World War II and how culture motivated, reflected, and challenged prevailing ideas about capitalism, communism, and American power. How did the government use literature and art to advance Cold War interests? How did writers and artists respond to the second red scare? What can Cold War culture teach us about literature and art in the twenty-first century? How is the Cold War still with us? This fall, we will use novels, films, and visual art to consider how the Cold War built the incongruous cultural world—free and constrained, creative and uniform—in which we live.
