Course Overview

In his 1984 autobiography, Amiri Baraka, the poet and spokesman of the Black Arts Movement, looked back on the mid-1950s as a moment of change. Dwight Eisenhower, born in 1890, had won a second term as president. John F. Kennedy, thirty years younger and soon to succeed him, had just arrived in the Senate. A young Baptist minister named Martin Luther King, new on the national stage, had led a successful movement to desegregate public transportation in Montgomery, Alabama. “This was, I think, a time of transition,” Baraka wrote. “From the cooled-out reactionary 50’s, the 50’s of the Cold War and McCarthyism and HUAC, to the late 50’s of the surging civil rights movement.”

This course is about that time of transition. The 1950s, though often remembered as a decade of conformity, also introduced the nation to a cast of rebels and outsiders: Holden Caulfield, James Dean, Alice Childress, the Beats, Nina Simone, and the characters of Mad magazine. The literature we will read this semester tells their stories and looks ahead to the tumultuous decade to come. We will witness a “slight rebellion” in J. D. Salinger’s The Catcher in the Rye (1951), encounter a different kind of sermon in James Baldwin’s Go Tell It on the Mountain (1953), catch a con man in Patricia Highsmith’s The Talented Mr. Ripley (1955), and achieve transcendence, or not, in Jack Kerouac’s The Dharma Bums (1958). This course asks which decade we’re talking about when we say “the fifties” and how that decade imagined and created the future.
